EPIC—Literally the first word that comes to mind after finishing up Christopher Rice's masterpiece, Bone Music. Charlotte doesn't have the cookie-cutter life that many would be able to relate to.

Ribs, also known as music on ribs, jazz on bones, bones or bone music are improvised gramophone recordings made from X-ray films. Mostly made through the 1950s and 1960s, ribs were a black market method of smuggling in and distributing music by foreign and emigre musicians that was banned from broadcast in the Soviet Union, such as Pyotr Leshchenko or Alexander Vertinsky, or Western artists such as Elvis, the Beatles, the Rolling Stones, the Beach Boys, Ella Fitzgerald and Chubby Checker.

Bone Music. In 1950s Soviet Russia, citizens craved Western popular music—everything from jazz to rock & roll. But smuggling vinyl was dangerous, and acquiring the scarce material to make copies of those records that did make it into the country was expensive.

Bone Music is a Dirge I got the feeling I was hearing/listening to a script for a movie instead of the pages of a book. There was way too much unnecessary, very detailed dialogue. In fact more than an hour + of reading could be deleted which would have enhanced my enjoyment of the plot. Too much dialogue became boring.

And I would have read Christopher Rice’s Bone Music much quicker if eye fatigue and life hadn’t gotten in the way. Rice, one of my favorite authors, has created a compelling tale, that of Charlotte Rowe, a young woman coping with the fact that the first seven years of her life were spent with serial killers.

Bone Music is the newest from Christopher and it’s an interesting mix of Serial Killer and SciFi. Charlotte is going through a lot and trying to deal with the aftermath of who her parents were. Then dealing with what she believes is a stalker. She is then thrown into something else, that can be understandable difficult to deal with.
